Four Year Old Brooklyn Child May Have Dread Infantile Paralysis-Health Officer Brophy to Confer With County Officials Regarding Using More Stringent Methods to Keep New York Children Out of Norwich Until Danger

One suspicious case of infantile paralysis was on Sunday quarantined by City Health Officer E. J. Brophy and will be clonely watched. Sunday Dr. Brophy received a visit from the parents of a four-year-old child who are visiting in this city, having come here from Brooklyn, N. Y., several days ago. The child showed signs of illness and after being examined by the health officer was quarantined at once as a suspicious case. The child was not allowed to remain at the West as a suspicious case. The child was not allowed to remain at the West Side house where its relatives are visiting but was sent to an empty tenement and a proper person provided to look after it. All suspicious cases are to be treated in like manner as the health officials will spare no effort to prevent the dread disease from entering and getting a foothold in this city.

Health Officer Brophy feels that more stringent methods should be taken at once and he is in favor of an order preventing any children entering this city from New York while there is the least danger of the disease being brought here. With this end in view he will hold a conference this morning with the county health officials to consider the legality of such an order.
